Robi Damelin

Was born in Johannesburg, South Africa, in 1945. She emigrated to Israel in 1967. Before that, she and her family had been involved in the anti-apartheid movement. In March 2002, Mrs Damelin's son David was killed in Hebron by a sniper while serving as a reservist. David was 28 years old and was completing a master's degree in Philosophy of Education at Tel Aviv University, believing that education could make a difference in Israel. After David's death, Robi felt a strong urge to do something to prevent other parents from experiencing the terrible pain of losing a child to the conflict. She is involved in organization Parents' Circle – Families Forum.

Layla Al Sheikh

A Palestinian, 46, studied economics, prefers numbers to words and has a calm, almost shy character. Born and raised in Jordan, she moved to Bethlehem after her marriage. On April 11, 2002, her eight-month-old baby Qusay developed a respiratory infection after inhaling tear gas fired during an Israeli incursion. His parents tried to take him to the hospital, located just twenty minutes away. It took them four hours because the soldiers voluntarily detained them at checkpoints. Too long for Qusay, who died 48 hours later. She is involved in organization Parents' Circle – Families Forum.
